THE ISI® DATABASE: THE JOURNAL SELECTION PROCESS

Note: This essay was updated in January-2004

The basic mission of ISI as a database publishing company is to provide comprehensive coverage of the world's most important and influential research. Today the ISI database covers over 16,000 international journals, books and proceedings in the sciences, social sciences and arts and humanities.

The 8,700 international journals that ISI covers on an annual basis are an important part of this data. ISI indexes complete bibliographic data for every item covered, including English-language author abstracts, author and publisher addresses, as well as the cited references of every journal.

ISI is committed to providing comprehensive coverage of the world's most important and influential journals for its subscribers' current awareness and retrospective information retrieval needs. But comprehensive does not necessarily mean all-inclusive.<sup>1</sup>

WHY BE SELECTIVE?

It would appear that, in order to be comprehensive, an index to the journal literature of science might be expected to cover all the scientific journals published. This approach would be not only impractical economically, but as analyses of the scientific literature have shown, unnecessary. It has been demonstrated that a relatively small number of journals publish the bulk of significant scientific results. This principle is often referred to as Bradford's Law.<sup>2</sup>

In the mid-1930's S. C. Bradford realized that the core literature for any given scientific discipline was composed of fewer than 1,000 journals. Of this 1,000 journals, there are relatively few with a very strong relevance to the given topic, whereas there are many with a weaker relevance to it. Those with a weak relevance to the given discipline or topic, however, typically have a strong relevance to another discipline. Thus, the core scientific literature can form itself around various topics, with individual journals becoming more or less relevant depending on the topic. Bradford understood that an essential core of journals forms the literature basis for all disciplines, and that, most of the important papers are published in relatively few journals.<sup>3</sup>

Recent citation analyses have shown that as few as 150 journals account for half of what is cited and one quarter of what is published. It has also been shown that a core of approximately 2,000 journals now accounts for about 85% of published articles and 95% of cited articles.<sup>4</sup> But this core is not static. Its basic composition changes constantly. The ISI editorial team's mission is to identify and evaluate promising new journals that will be useful to ISI subscribers, and to delete journals that have become less useful.

THE EVALUATION PROCESS

Journal evaluation and selection is conducted on an ongoing basis at ISI with journals added to and deleted from the database as frequently as every two weeks. ISI's editorial staff reviews nearly 2,000 new journal titles annually, but only 10-12% of the journals evaluated is selected. Moreover, existing journal coverage in ISI products is also constantly under review. Journals now covered are monitored to ensure that they are maintaining high standards and a clear relevance to the ISI products in which they are covered.

Each journal goes through an extensive evaluation process before being selected or rejected. The ISI editors performing journal evaluations have educational backgrounds relevant to their areas of responsibility as well as experience and education in information science. Their knowledge of the literature of their field is extended by consultation with established networks of advisors who participate in the evaluation process when needed.

Many factors are taken into account when evaluating journals for coverage, ranging from the qualitative to the quantitative. The journal's basic publishing standards, its editorial content, the international diversity of its authorship, and the citation data associated with it are all considered. No one factor is considered in isolation, but by combining and interrelating the data, the editor is able to determine the journal's overall strengths and weaknesses.

BASIC JOURNAL STANDARDS

Timeliness of publication is one of the most basic criteria in the evaluation process, and it is of primary importance. A journal must be publishing according to its stated frequency to be considered for initial inclusion in the ISI database. The ability to publish on time implies a healthy backlog of manuscripts essential for ongoing viability. It is not acceptable for a journal to appear chronically late, weeks or months after its cover date.<sup>5</sup> To measure timeliness adequately, a coverage decision can never be based on just one issue; generally, the editor needs to see at least three issues.

ISI also notes whether or not the journal follows international editorial conventions, which optimize retrievability of source articles. These conventions include informative journal titles, fully descriptive article titles and abstracts, complete bibliographic information for all cited references, and full address information for every author.

English language article titles, abstracts, and keywords are essential. English language cited references are also recommended. Although, important scientific information is published in all languages, authors must provide English translations of article titles, author keywords, and abstracts if they hope to reach the widest possible audience. Likewise, as a purely practical matter, it would not be feasible for ISI to take on the task of translating this material.

Application of the peer review process is another indication of the journal's standards and indicates overall quality of the research presented and the completeness of cited references.<sup>6</sup>

EDITORIAL CONTENT

The true core of the scientific literature is embodied in a relatively small number of journals. However, scientific research continues to give rise to specialized fields of studies, and new journals emerge as published research on a new topic achieves critical mass. The ISI editor determines if the content of a new journal will enrich the database or if the topic is already adequately covered.

The enormous amount of data at their fingertips, and their daily observation of virtually every new science journal published, position the ISI editorial team to spot emerging topics, and "hot fields" in the literature.

INTERNATIONAL DIVERSITY

Geographic representation of a journal is another consideration. To meet the needs of its international subscriber base, ISI seeks to cover journals with international diversity among authors of both source articles and cited articles.

To properly reflect the global context in which scientific research takes place, and to provide balanced coverage in each category, ISI seeks to cover the best regional journals as well. However, rather than compare a regional journal with all journals in a particular subject category, the ISI editor considers it in terms of those journals in the category from the same geographic area. High journal publishing standards, especially timeliness, and English language bibliographic elements remain essential.

CITATION ANALYSIS

The ISI evaluation process is unique in that ISI editors have a wealth of citation data at their disposal. The importance of correctly interpreting and understanding these data when evaluating journals cannot be emphasized too strongly. Because the number of journals varies greatly among disciplines, discipline-specific citation rates also vary greatly. Smaller fields like botany or mathematics do not generate as many articles or citations as do larger fields such as biotechnology or genetics. Likewise, in some areas, particularly in the arts and humanities, it may take a relatively long time for an article to attract a meaningful number of citations, whereas in other areas, such as the life sciences, it is not unusual for citations to peak after only a few years.<sup>7</sup> These facts must be taken into consideration if citation data are to be used correctly.

Several types of citation data are used. For established journals, these include overall citation rate, impact factor, and immediacy index. For brand new journals, the editors examine the publishing record of the journal's authors and editorial board members, noting where their articles have been published and if their work has been cited. Also, because ISI captures all cited references from each of the 8,700 journals covered, citation information is available on covered journals as well as those not covered; that is, journals that have been cited by any of the 8,700 core journals.

Self-citation rates are also taken into consideration. The self-cited rate relates a journal's self-citations to the number of times it is cited by all journals including itself. For example, journal X was cited 15,000 times by all journals, including the 2,000 times it cited itself. Its self-cited rate is  $2/15$  or 13.3%. A journal's self-citation rate may indicate something about its field: a high self-citation rate may mean that the field is small or isolated. Multidisciplinary journals tend to have low self-citation rates.

Eighty per cent of all journals listed in the JCR Science Edition have self-citation rates of less than 20%. However, each individual subject category can have its own norm with regard to self-citations. Significant deviation from clearly observable norms requires examination by ISI to determine if excessive self-citations are being used to artificially inflate the Impact Factor, or if a high rate of self-citation is normal in the context of the journal's subject category.

SOCIAL SCIENCES AND ARTS & HUMANITIES

Social Sciences journals undergo the same thorough evaluation as Natural Science journals. Publishing standards, editorial content, international diversity, and citation data are all considered. Standard citation metrics are employed while keeping in mind that, in general, Impact Factors and overall citation rates in the Social Sciences are lower than those in the Natural Sciences. In both these fields citation activity tends to follow a linear pattern of rise, peak, and decline.

Publishing standards, including timeliness, are also important in the evaluation of Arts and Humanities journals. Citations in the Arts and Humanities, however, do not necessarily follow this same predictable pattern as citations to Social Sciences and Natural Sciences articles. Citations to an article on the 19th Century Romantic novel, for example, may accrue slowly at first, and then slacken, fluctuating over time in cycles consistent with scholars' varying interest in the topic. In addition, Arts and Humanities journal articles reference non-journal sources heavily (e.g., books, musical compositions, works of art and literature). Consequently, citation data, while sometimes useful, are frequently much less so in journal evaluations in the Arts and Humanities.

Arts & Humanities journals are selected by the primary editor with the support of the subject experts from the ISI Arts & Humanities indexing staff. The goal is the collection of superb Arts and Humanities content that reflects the complex nature of cultural phenomena across a broad range of fields.

ELECTRONIC JOURNALS

As stated earlier, the basic mission of ISI is to provide access to the world's most important and influential journals. This commitment extends to the evaluation and inclusion of electronic journals.

E-Journals undergo the same rigorous selection as journals in print media. Publishing Standards, Editorial Content, International Diversity, and Citation Analysis are all considered.

Timeliness of publication requires a somewhat different approach when an e-journal publishes articles one at a time rather than collecting articles for release as an 'issue'. Where this approach is taken ISI simply looks for a steady flow of articles over several months time.

The Format of Electronic Journals is extremely important to ISI. Following are a set of guidelines for Electronic Journal formats. Following these guidelines helps insure correct citation of articles and reduces the possibility of ambiguity in citation of articles.

Insure that it is easy to identify the following elements:

- Journal Title
- Year of publication
- Volume and/or Issue Number (if applicable)
- Article Title
- Page Number or Article Number (one or the other is required; article number should not be the DOI) If your journal has both page numbers and article numbers, list them separately and not merged together. EXAMPLE: Art. #23, pp. 6-10 and not 23.6-23.10
- Authors names and addresses
- Label all article identifiers such as DOIs, PII's and Article Numbers
- A complete table-of-contents for each issue that includes the page/article number for each article (unless journal is being published as single articles)

Labeling these identifiers in both source articles and in citations helps insure their proper use by those referencing the article and correct labeling by abstracting and indexing firms such as ISI.

Each article must be assigned a unique page number or article number (whichever numbering scheme is being used) within any one given issue. Additionally, article numbers must be unique within an entire volume number. If the same article numbers are repeated in each issue within a volume, ambiguities will result when citing the original article. A citation to V 20, art. 1, May 2002, (even when adding the author's name), would be difficult to find if V 20, art. 1 June 2002 also exists. Avoid duplication of article numbers. References to Your Electronic Journal Instruct authors to include the following information when citing your e-journal:

- Journal title (use one standard abbreviation for your journal; avoid acronyms that may be confused with other titles)
- Volume number (if applicable)
- Issue Number (if applicable; within parenthesis)
- Page number and/or article number (clearly identifying the article number as such)
- Year of publication
